SPECIAL THANKS

Thanks to Tracy Wainwright for her strong dedication to creating this remarkable Job Journal as it is today. For several consecutive years, Tracy had created the Job Journal for all to read. It started from 50 subscribers to over 1,000 subscribers as of 2022. Tracy was intensely committed to her agency and the customers she served by collecting these resources and, without a doubt, searching for articles, resources, and classifieds that would benefit her customers. As some of you know, unfortunately, Tracy is no longer with us at the American Job Center/Department of Social Services. But her loyalty and dedication through the Job Journal will remain community strong.

1. How many years did you orchestrate the Job Journal? I worked on The Job Journal for 4 years. My predecessor had also distributed a newsletter, and when others discovered my new role at Social Services, I was asked if I would be developing a similar resource. There were so many requests we made the decision to put together a comprehensive employment and training “guide.”

2. What was the purpose of the Job Journal when the Job Journal was your responsibility? The Job Journal began as a resource for Social Services' TANF customers. It was a way for us to consolidate local employment and training opportunities and other relevant resources to give to our customers in one package.

3. What was the most exciting part of the Job Journal? My favorite thing regarding The Job Journal has always been the feedback I received from the customers and the community. The best part of my days was when someone said, "I got a job from a listing in the newsletter," or "I have a customer who enrolled in a workshop or training they saw in The Job Journal."

4. How long did it take for you to create the Job Journal every week? I was fortunate to have many community partners and businesses regularly send their information about upcoming employment opportunities and training. Updating and compiling all the information took 4-5 hours every week.

5. How many people did you send the Job Journal to when you first took over the Job Journal after you retired from it? The first issue of The Job Journal went out to approximately 75 people in Wicomico, Worcester, and Somerset Counties. The last issue I sent went to over 900 emails in 6 counties. Every week there were requests to be added to the mailing list. I always loved that because it proved to me that this little newsletter was actually helpful, and others saw the value in it as well. It has been a humbling experience and a project I am very proud of. And I am absolutely thrilled that The Job Journal will continue because of your hard work and dedication!

We would like to express our sincerest gratitude for a job well done!

WORKPLACE TRENDS TO WATCH IN 2023

So rapid are the forces of change; many organizations in the United States are still reckoning with the effects caused by the COVID-19 pandemic and the Great Resignation.

The future of work is dynamic. One would need an entire book to describe the many forces affecting trends in the workplace now and in the years to come. Unfortunately, by the time that book made it to print, its contents would be out of date.

So rapid are the forces of change, many organizations in the United States are still reckoning with the effects caused by the COVID-19 pandemic and the Great Resignation. The proliferation of remote work, and a class of highly skilled employees increasingly empowered to seek better jobs with better pay and benefits, still echo among the top workplace trends in store for 2023. For C-suite and HR leaders, the challenges of tomorrow will evolve quickly from the challenges of today.

Here are five workplace trends that will take center stage in 2023:

1. Addressing the global talent shortage:

Korn Ferry estimates that the global human talent shortage will reach 85 million people by 2030. Private organizations and governments will be challenged like never before to help find ways to accelerate their development processes, and build expanded talent acquisition capabilities, to meet this demand. Companies will need strategies to incentivize their employees to stay — using long-term incentives, benefits, and flexible workplace policies — to stem the outflow of employees who possess in-demand skills. Their options will expand significantly amid the coming competition for talent. Companies will also be challenged to find ways to automate work that is more tactical or transactional, looking to AI and robotics to fill gaps.

2. The emergence of the agile workplace:

One solution to address the global talent shortage includes becoming more fluid and agile with regard to acquiring and employing talent. Many companies are moving toward a borderless talent acquisition strategy, in which leaders hire based on skill sets regardless of where the employee is located (often creating additional legal entities or utilizing payroll services companies). Another popular strategy is the flexible work environment, in which in-person, hybrid, and remote work combine to meet the needs of the business with the right talent. Google, Meta, Salesforce and AirBnb are among the businesses that have stated they will allow people to remain remote if they choose, and are helping their teams find ways of working in a fully distributed model. Google provides “distributed work playbooks” for leaders, managers, distributed employees and their buddies to ensure they are “getting connected, being connected and feeling connected” to their overall workplace.

Here are five workplace trends that will take center stage in 2023:

Some companies are moving to an office-less model to help go remote-only. GitLab, as an example, has 1,500 employees in more than 65 countries with no company-owned offices.

3. The emergence of the flexible workforce

The demands of work will require working across traditional departmental barriers. Employees will be asked to take on projects based on skills that transcend traditionally defined roles. The World Economic Forum suggests investing in “human” skills — creativity, originality and initiative, critical thinking, persuasion and negotiation, emotional intelligence, social influence to help navigate this emerging future. McKinsey’s survey of 18,000 people in 15 countries further defined skills needed in the future world of work: cognitive skills like mental flexibility, interpersonal skills like inclusiveness and conflict resolution, digital analysis, and self-leadership skills like self-motivation, grit and persistence.

4. Physical and mental wellbeing gain importance

Talent shortages, supply-chain difficulties, business uncertainty, and war are among the global forces exacerbating the demand on today’s employees. The risk of burnout will remain high. Recent studies by Gallup and ThriveMyWay revealed that 50 to 60 percent of employees say they are burned out, for reasons including needing to be available 24/7 for their employers, lack of support by their managers (many of whom may also be overwhelmed), unreasonable time constraints, and other reasons. A Korn Ferry study indicated 89% of professionals say they have experienced burnout in the last two years, and 80% of that group says they’re more burned out now than at the start of the pandemic. Employers will need to invest in a series of countermeasures: improved workforce planning to better predict what skills/roles and how many roles are needed, more generous hours and/or flexible schedules (including extra time off to recharge), tools and techniques for mental health and well-being, and expanding support for groups that may have left the workforce in an effort to woo them back. Companies will need to help improve their frequency of communication, appeal to and support employees' common social interests, and determine ways for in-person and remote staff to connect more frequently to drive a sense of integration and belonging. Many companies are already making moves in this direction. Fortune noted that 66% of companies are planning to or have made changes for mental well-being in 2022.

Here are five workplace trends that will take center stage in 2023:

5.The importance of sustainability.

Creating a sustainable future is a trending topic as nations and private organizations pursue measures to limit global warming and address the climate crisis. Even institutional investors such as Blackrock are making climate one of their key issues in evaluating their investment choices and voting decisions for companies. This will be further highlighted as Gen Z (born from 1997-2012) comes into the workforce. Addressing Climate change is the No. 1 concern among this age group, according to a recent Deloitte survey. Nearly half (49%) state their personal ethics and beliefs have played a role in their career choices. Companies won't just push forward on sustainability because it's the right thing to do, or a good business practice, but because it will be required to attract and retain the talent they need for the future.

The Importance of Becoming a Lifelong Learner

Markets, industries, and trends are constantly changing, becoming a complex and competitive landscape only worsened by ever-increasing digitalization and globalization. For many professionals, this means that their job competition is continually expanding, leaving many wondering how they can stand apart and stay on top of all these moving parts? Most don't realize that employers look for skills rather than checking your current job title or a laundry list of official qualifications. So what does lifelong learning mean to you? and how can you become one?

We answer these questions and more below.

What is Lifelong Learning?

Life-long learning is self-initiated and self-directed education that focuses on personal development and achieving personal fulfillment. While many take this to generally mean that life-long learning happens outside of educational institutes such as corporate training, school or university – it doesn't have a standardized definition and can occur anywhere, anytime.

Importance of lifelong learning

Things change, there are new regulations, compliance, tax laws, things keep changing. So we always have to be at the forefront and figuring out what's next. That attitude of being a learner is what will separate you from everybody else. We have to be lifelong learners. Learning never ends.

Why develop the mindset of a lifelong learner

Not only do life-long learners thrive on discovering new knowledge and using it to transform their customers' lives for the better.

To apply for the WIOA Training Program click on the link below

<https://lswa.org/wioa-adult-dislocated-worker-training/>

Such individuals understand that being a lifelong learner is the defining factor that will separate you from everybody else, making them substantial assets to the company. But that's not all, below is our take on why you should always aim to develop the mindset of a lifelong learner:

Improved confidence: Extending our knowledge and skills in both professional and personal areas can increase our self-confidence tenfold.

Refreshed internal motivation: Lifelong learning helps to remedy motivational slumps from time to time when things become more routine and less passionate in your life. It can help remind you what excites, influences and drives you to be the best you.

What does being a lifelong learner mean to you?

Now, I'll be honest with you. When I first started my sales career back in the dark ages in financial services, I closed a lot of deals with my energy. But my product knowledge was lacking, my competitor knowledge was lacking, my industry and market knowledge was lacking and I was struggling and I wasn't hitting my targets. Then my manager called me into his office. I remember this day like it was yesterday and he said "Tom, you need to get some product knowledge training." And I said "Why do I need to learn more? I'm already doing pretty well, I don't want to get bogged down with the details" and he told me.

VETERANS PROGRAM OUTREACH

When you've served in the military long enough, you might relate all of your experiences to the armed forces and the tasks you're assigned by a superior. Many service members follow a very programmed career progression, so initiative may not be as absolute in the military as it is in the civilian world where self-promotion is key to career advancement. That said, your employment application for civilian or private-sector work must be your marketing tool to highlight your skills and capabilities, particularly those acquired during military service.

Five Tips For Virtual Interviews: How Zoom Changes Hiring

What will interviewing be like after the pandemic? This is the question on many people's minds — whether they're CHROs or candidates thinking about starting a new job search.

Widespread Covid-19 vaccinations may make it more likely that companies will return to pre-pandemic operations, but many leaders won't let go of some of the tools they adopted during the past year and a half's remote workplace.

At Raines, an executive search and leadership consulting firm, we have interviewed thousands of candidates over Zoom or Microsoft Teams during the past 18 months to find leadership and talent to drive transformation and results. Below are a few of my tips for hiring managers.

1. Remember that more isn't always better

One major advantage to video interviewing is the ability to see more candidates faster. Just because you can interview 40 people for a position doesn't mean you should. If you are interviewing several candidates, do not schedule them back to back — the interactions will likely blend together. Block out 10 to 15 minutes before interviews to review resumes and position descriptions, prepare questions and get in the right mindset. Directly afterward, allot time to record your impressions, complete scorecards or ratings and confirm that your impressions are backed up by objective data points. The longer you wait to do this, the more likely you are to confuse candidates or misremember information.

2. Try to level the playing field.

If you interview one candidate by phone, another by video and a third in person, you may evaluate them differently. Since it may be hard to interview candidates in the same format, standardize as much of the interview process as you can to help mitigate bias. For instance, proximity bias favors those closest to you, i.e., in-person interviewees. Here are some suggestions:

- Develop structured interview questions that are pre-set and pre-ordered for all interviewees to ensure a more equitable process.
- Create clear, consistent rating scales the whole interview team can use to score interviewees, their qualifications and their answers.

- Make sure any information, be it positive or negative, is backed by objective information. Don't just say the interviewee seemed bored; explain that the interviewee was constantly looking at their watch or needed you to repeat questions.
- Finally, if possible, don't hold a group evaluation of candidates until each interviewer has completed and submitted a thorough evaluation of individual candidates in writing, through a scoring system or to a neutral party.

3. Turn off distractions.

We are all tempted to check e-mails or respond to chats during a phone or video call. It's best to turn off all distractions (like notifications and ringers) so you can record more meaningful data and engage in substantive discussion.

4. Be mindful of energy levels.

Interview exhaustion can be even more pronounced with remote interviews. Video calls can be draining, and Zoom fatigue can set in. Create breaks in between interviews for snacks and water.

5. Don't write off candidates because of their background or home setup.

They may not have the space for a home office, or their partner or roommate may also be on a call at the same time. Be sure to be mindful of the issue of what Taharee Jackson calls videoclassism — which, in this case, refers to the intrusion of socioeconomics into an interview. After all, in-person interviewees are not required to show potential employers their inner sanctums, so why should video candidates be judged by their homes? Likewise, be forgiving of any at-home interruptions from children, pets or deliveries. Lead with empathy and understanding.

So many of our behaviors at work and at home have changed given our universal pandemic experience. The same holds true for interviewing. I believe virtual interviewing is here to stay, and there are many reasons to embrace it.
